You're not challenging each other. Vertically moved to obtain a greater perspective and visibility or move sideways in a different sector to increase the challenge in this way. Both strategies works to get out of stagnation. Set to always provide an answer, I propose a simple strategy: I don't know "when you don't know be sideways in a different sector to increase the challenge in this way. Both strategies works to get out of stagnation. . and I intend to discover" or "... I'll come back to you" or "... what do you think?" Now, this is not an excuse not to prepare yourself as a crazy for questions you plan to get during your next great presentation. I recently seen an episode of Shark Tank in which the competitor was refused by Mark Cuban. During the part of the question and answers after the tone of him, he left no room to reflect or open to take Cuban's advice. He came as arrogant because he had an answer for everything. Clearly he was not interested in working with someone like Le-e, based on that I saw, I would not even be. The alternative is to think about your knowledge and ability to answer guestions in three levels: base, elongation, and growth. You should absolutely have the fundamental and fundamental knowledge necessary to play the role you paid. You should stretch yourself and look for answers to all the questions about and around the edges of your experience, the questions you are able to anticipate but do not yet know the answer. And you should intentionally put yourself in situations that challenge your thoughts by exposing yourself to questions that you could not expect. These are the most memorable. They remain with you and have the potential to change the course of your most important job. Chase the questions that will push you to work not only do you as a person, but also show your team that you are humble and arranged Learn, two underestimated but excellent quality in a leader. Remember what to say "I don't know" from time to time does not make you seem incompetent: in reality the trust of your team that always gives the true answer you can.
